School visions should be developed in conjunction with the stakeholders of the community. Schools exist to serve the needs of the community. The vision, then, should guide the school in developing its students into productive members of society so they can go on to serve the community as well. A good school vision takes the opinions of the administrators, teachers, community members, and students into consideration because those are all the people that the school works with and serves. Ultimately, the vision should be based on what the school is doing for its students today, but also what the school hopes to develop the students into for tomorrow. Having a vision that is short-sighted on what the school is doing today does nothing to get the students ready for life after high school and focuses on the students alone. The vision should be created with the students futures in mind so that the school is working to develop students into productive citizens in their futures. Focusing on the future and what you aim to help the students become will benefit all community members rather than just the students because the students are being developed into men and women who can give back to the community. A school that has an end goal in mind for what the students become is fulfilling its ultimate purpose by serving the community. The students leave high school ready to help and serve the community, thus help the school reach its vision.
